

Assistant Teaching Professor in Sociolinguistics

Position Description

The Program in Linguistics at Emory University in Atlanta, GA seeks a full-time faculty member in Sociolinguistics at the rank of Assistant Teaching Professor to begin Fall 2023. We are looking for a strong teacher-scholar dedicated to undergraduate education to join our thriving program. We are seeking a language variationist who works in minoritized language varieties and communities in North America, such as African American Language, Latinx language, LGBTQ+ varieties, Indigenous languages, Jewish languages, ASL, or other. A PhD in Linguistics (or a closely related field) is required; degree in hand is preferred, but advanced ABDs will be considered.

We are looking for a dynamic instructor with classroom experience in Linguistics to teach 5 courses per year (3-2 teaching load), including introductory and advanced courses in sociolinguistics, general linguistics, language variation, and the candidate's area of expertise. Candidates should be able to mentor a diverse community of students and consider linguistics to be fundamentally connected to issues of social justice and Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion.

The position of Assistant Teaching Professor is a part of Emory's Lecture Track Faculty (LTF) with renewable contracts, and with the possibility of promotion through the ranks of Associate Teaching Professor and Full Teaching Professor
